Colors have an amazing ability to influence our emotions and behavior in ways that we are often not even aware of. Colors are not just visual elements, but contain deeper meanings and feelings that can shape our experiences and moods. When we talk about color psychology, it is about understanding how different shades can affect our mental and emotional health and how we can use this knowledge to improve our quality of life. Colors can evoke feelings and reactions that are universal but also culturally specific. Art is more than just color and shape; it is a powerful method of communication that can influence our feelings, thoughts, and actions. Each shade contains an emotion, a story, and the potential to influence our mood. In a world where inequality and injustice are still typical of many societies, Harri Ylikomi hopes that his art will serve as a catalyst for dialogue and reflection. Harri Ylikomi believes that art can bring people together, regardless of background or culture, and create a common forum for discussing important issues. When we talk about the psychology of color, it is about understanding how different shades can affect our mental and emotional health and how we can use this knowledge to improve our quality of life. Colors can create drama, calm, joy or sadness, and by combining different colors, artists can create depth and complexity in their works. This emotional power of color is what Harri Ylikomi strives to convey in his own artworks, where each brushstroke is intended to evoke emotions and reflections in the viewer. Colors connect us, inspire us and help us see the world with new eyes.
